

NEW-YORKISMS.

From Our Own Correspondent.

NEW YORK, Aug. 5, 1870.

The Early-Closing Association. Last evening, impelled by curiosity and the desire to do my duty as a writer of New-Yorkisms, I went to Plymouth Hall, in which, every Thursday evening, the members of the Saleswomen's Early-Closing Association hold a meeting. Plymouth Hall is situated in Ninth street, near Third avenue. The meetings are held in a second-story room which overlooks Ninth street. The room will seat about 125 people. About 30 people occupied it last night. Of these about six were men. No adult male was admitted who was not a member either of the press or of the Male Clerks' Early-Closing Association. Considering that there are about 15,000 saleswomen in the city, the proportion attending last night's meeting must be accounted very small indeed.

I reached Plymouth Hall about 8 o'clock, and found there three women, a boy, and two men, one of whom is a reporter. Outwardly gruff but inwardly amiable, I watched and waited until half-past 8, during which time the first three rows of chairs became occupied. When that hour arrived a gentleman, who, subsequently, was throughout the evening addressed by Miss Netta as sergeant-at-arms, came up to me and asked me whether I was a Male Clerk. In a calm and dignified voice I informed him that to the best of my knowledge and belief the first half of that designation appertained to me, but that I had not the honor of being able to lay claim to the last. Thereupon I handed him my card, upon reading which he said it was all right, and explained that they were obliged to be particular in excluding every male who did not represent either the press or the Male Clerks' Early-Closing Association. The object was to exclude employers. It was feared that many employers might attend for the purpose of discovering which of their saleswomen are members of the association. The consequence of such discovery would of course be the discharge of the saleswomen in question.

Previous to this interrogation, however, my nerves had been considerably shaken by hearing an indignant feminine voice ejaculate from the landing-place outside.

"It's just to see the girls! That's all he's come for!"

I may be mistaken. I will not swear that I am correct, but I think that is the substance of what was said, and that it had relation to me. Evidently I was regarded by the speaker as an inquirer, a heartless and depraved wretch who had attended the meeting for the purpose of hating victims to destruction, and feeding my looks with the spectacle of bright eyes and rosy blushes whose owners eloquently explained the state of their poor feet, and "pitched into" their miserable-minded employers. However, having satisfied the gentleman who came to me that I was merely a harmless looker-on in Vienna, I was left alone during the rest of the evening.

At half-past eight a group of women came in, and the sergeant-at-arms stationed himself on a chair beside the door. The group was led by a woman of twenty-five, dressed in black, and wearing an Alpine hat that cast a shadow over her features. This was "Miss Netta," the voluminous correspondent of the Sun. Upon reaching the upper part of the hall, where she was received with applause, "Miss Netta" stated that the president was unaccountably absent, and put the question, who should be president, to the vote. The vote resulted in the election of Mr. Houghton, and the business of the meeting proceeded.

I am sorry that I cannot say with truth that many points of great interest were brought to light. In the first place, the meeting was extremely small. A heavy shower in the early part of the evening had evidently kept away many who would otherwise have attended. Those who did attend were silent and demure. One or two kept themselves aloof from the herd, with an air of elegant and scornful exclusiveness. Two or three of the women were as old as fifty; two or three of the girls as young as fifteen. All of them, with one or two exceptions, evinced an unquenchable unwillingness to hand in their experiences. In vain Mr. Houghton invited them, in vain "Miss Netta" exhorted, going over again the dismal ground of her own experience, and telling them they had nothing to fear so long as they worked together and had the newspapers on their side. "Miss Netta" impressed on me as being a young woman quite able to take her own part. By this I do not mean that anything in her speech or manner was offensive, but that she seemed to have been goaded by her grievances to that point at which the hindrances presented by shamefacedness are thrown away, and the woman forces herself into a bravery that is foreign to her nature. I will not repeat all that "Miss Netta" said, simply because it has already been so often printed. The principal grievances she complained of are that saleswomen are paid shamefully small salaries (five, six, and seven dollars per week); that they are compelled to stand from 8 o'clock in the morning until 10 at night; and that they have none of the conveniences which women have a right to expect, not by reason of their womanhood merely, but on the common ground of humanity.

At the conclusion of her speech, Mrs. Woodhull, of the firm of Woodhull & Claflin, came forward. Mrs. Woodhull is an extremely modest-looking and bashful-voiced woman, considering the quantity and quality of the reputation she enjoys. She looks to be about thirty-five; has brown hair, cut short; wears an Alpine hat that cast over her features a shadow which rendered them almost undistinguishable, and spoke in a confused and timid voice. She had attended the meeting, she said, merely to learn precisely what it was the girls did want. She professed total ignorance as yet of what their desires were, but promised the support of her paper if, upon hearing them, she found that they approved. She was succeeded by Mrs. George M. Battery, who made one of the neatest and most sensible speeches of the evening. She commenced by begging her hearers not to confuse her with too much applause, as this was the first time she had ever made a speech in public. She called the girls her "dear girls," but I do not believe that the affectionateness of the address was due to an interest pretended and not felt. It would be untrue to say that anything of any special importance was done. Any meeting of this nature must possess some importance, and it is on that account that I venture to give you some idea of the latest one that has taken place.

—Eliza Moody, a nurseryman of Lockport, N. Y., recently found a set of false teeth that he had been in quest of for twelve years. Being under the impression that they had been stolen with an overcoat while he was preparing to speak at a fruit-growers' meeting in Rochester, he was not a little surprised to find them at the root of a tree in an excellent state of preservation. His joy was so great that he immediately threw off the "Moody" appearance so natural to him, put the teeth in his mouth and went to visit his friends.

NEWSBOYS AS DOG-CATCHERS.

They Overdo the Business and are Placed on the Streets.

The St. Louis Democrat of Wednesday last says:—

Several days ago when mad dogs were running wild on the streets, biting people and frightening everybody, the Mayor ordered the City Marshal to employ a strong force of dog-catchers, and to seize and impound every dog found outside of his own premises without a muzzle.

Marshal Rorer at once advertised for twenty skilled dog-catchers, offering fifty cents for each dog caught and impounded. But the dog-catching business is not a popular one, and men do not like to engage in it. The Marshal had great difficulty in filling the quota called for, and might never have succeeded in subduing the canine host had he not hit upon a happy expedient. He knew that boys, as a general thing, have no conscientious scruples against tormenting a dog, a cat, or any other animal that comes within their reach. He therefore invited the rising generation to volunteer in the dog war. The call was responded to by a host of newboys, who, itching for the fun, and not averse to the fees, came in gangs to the Marshal's office, and were sent upon the war-path.

That was a sorry day for the dogs when the newboys took up arms against them. The effect of their onslaught was soon perceptible. The dogs began to disappear rapidly. There never was such a slaughter of dogs since the great Cheyenne dog feast. The boys, on delivering their captives at the depot, received certificates, or dog scrip, which, on presentation to the Marshal, were redeemed in cash, at the rate of fifty cents per dog.

As the newboys increased in skill the dogs diminished in number, and length dogs became quite scarce, and the profits of the boys diminished from day to day. A council of war was held, and the increasing scarcity of dogs was discussed in all its bearings. As a remedy it was agreed to seize muzzled dogs as well as unmuzzled dogs, and to invade the premises of the owners and carry off all dogs wherever found. This policy was vigorously carried out for a day or two; but the owners of dogs that were muzzled or tied up complained bitterly to the Marshal, and some of them threatened to sue for damages.

This brought matters to a crisis. The Marshal issued a proclamation against the newboys, and prohibited them from catching any more dogs.

Yesterday a delegation of the boys who had been placed on the "retired list" called at the Mayor's office, and demanded the redemption of their dog scrip. He took down the names of the little lads, with the nicknames given them by their comrades. Here is a sample:—William Garvin, "Cod"; James Brady, "Slouch"; James Sullivan, "South Paw"; Tom Penney, "Tom Cat"; William Lowney, "Slobbery"; John Sheehan, "Top Barrel"; Pat McNulty, "Lunch Chucker."

These boys had averaged about four dogs a day, equivalent to $2, besides the "lots of fun" enjoyed by them in the chase.

It is probable that the war will come to a close this week, as there are but few dogs left in the city.

INDIAN HORRORS.

Shew of White Men Drawn Out for Bowstrings.

From the Plains correspondence of the Cincinnati Gazette we take the following horrible story:—

The Indian depredations continue along the border, and every day brings a new horror. The most recent of which makes the blood run cold. A few days ago three men, Dr. Bard, Harvey Morgan, and a Mr. Mason, while on a hunt, were captured by a band of thirty-five Indians, thirty-five miles distant, were attacked and killed by arrows and Sioux Indians. The struggle must have been a desperate one, and the unfortunate men, no doubt, sold their lives as dearly as possible, pools of blood and pieces of clothing being found in various places where the Indians had taken refuge behind the hills. Under the wagon were found a large number of exploded shells of fixed ammunition, which had been exploded by the white men, and two pools of blood, showing that they fought after being wounded.

When found, the bodies were all stripped and horribly mutilated. One of the foreheads rested on the breast of Dr. Bard, where he had been put by the Indians and scalped alive. His writhing and struggles had torn up the soil, showing that he had been buried under the wheel of the wagon, before death ensued. Morgan lay near the wagon stark naked and scalped. The hammer of the wagon had been taken out and the handle driven into his temple up to the shaft, completely pinning the head to the ground. It could not be drawn out, so firmly was it imbedded in the skull bones, and it had to be buried with him. His thighs and back were cut open, and the sinews taken out for bow strings. Mr. Mason had an iron rod three feet long forced in his back, and his legs cut off. The bodies were all drawn out. Most of these barbarities had undoubtedly been committed while the men were yet alive, and their sufferings must have been terrible. There were other indignities committed on their persons too horrible to relate. As soon as the news reached the United States camp, Colonel Bartlett sent out Lieutenant Smith with thirty infantry men, in a wagon, who brought in the bodies and buried them at Poplar.
